To compare lens gene expression following changes in the permeability of the lens capsule. The permeability to the lens capsule of the isolated mouse lens was changed by lowering the temperature (from 37 to 25 degrees C) or by adding calcium (from 10 to 1,000 mM). Total RNA was isolated from the isolated lens. The RNA was then labelled and hybridized to a mouse lens cDNA microarray. Changes in the expression of known lens-specific genes were identified by the criterion of a positive signal with low background noise. Genes in the lens capsule that were up-regulated were studied further by quantitative PCR (Q-PCR) on lens capsules. Changes in the expression of putative genes in the lens capsules were also studied by Q-PCR. A small number of known genes were found to be up-regulated in the lens capsule following both reductions and increases in lens capsule permeability. Six of these genes also showed up-regulation in the lens cortex. There was also a small number of putative genes that were down-regulated, but none of the putative genes showed up-regulation in the cortex
