The influence of age on the frequency of preterm births associated with epidural analgesia. To assess whether the risk of preterm labour after a preinduction epidural analgesia is lower in older women. We studied a total of 649 singleton pregnancies with a planned preinduction epidural analgesia. The distribution of labour and mode of delivery were compared between pregnant women grouped according to whether they were less than 35 years old (group 1, n = 176), 35-39 years old (group 2, n = 153), and 40 years old or older (group 3, n = 252) and their neonatal outcomes. Other variables such as parity, maternal body mass index, and hypertensive disorders of pregnancy were similar in the three age groups. Cervical Bishop score was significantly lower in the older women. The frequency of preterm labour was significantly lower in group 2 than in group 3 (16.5% vs. 23.9%). The risk of preterm labour and birth in the older women was not significantly different compared to that of younger women, but the rate of preterm labour was higher in older women who had had a Bishop score above 6. The use of an epidural analgesia in older women is not associated with a higher risk of spontaneous preterm labour.
